

Classroom Web surfing rude, distracting

We all know being in those large general education courses are annoying.

These classes are mainly annoying due to the large numbers of students enrolled in them. Also when you are actually trying to pay attention to the lecture, the students next to you are just trying to socialize.

I would have to say the most annoying thing students do in these big classes is surf the Web during lectures.

I have two of these large lecture classes. In my TRAD class I always seem to sit behind or beside someone who is constantly surfing the Web. What is really aggravating is when these students are on YouTube watching videos.

It is not like I am trying to see what these people are looking at, but it is hard to ignore the videos flashing on the screen in front of you. It is distracting and rude, and should not be happening in the classroom.

I honestly don't care what other students do in their own personal time. I believe, though, that students should respect each other, especially in the classrooms. So next time you find yourself surfing the Web during class, think twice. We all know you are paying a lot of money to be there, so respect your time and the others around you.

Sarah Allen

linguistics freshman